ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This book would never have happened were it not for my PhD supervisor Peter Neumann, who pushed me to put my thesis on hold in order to write it. He guided me through the book proposal process and has remained supportive throughout, providing the type of mentoring all PhD students hope to receive. I was doubly blessed in this department, as my secondary supervisor, Anatol Lieven, is an acknowledged expert on Pakistan. He not only provided critical feedback, but also an entrée to a number of sources in Pakistan. Peter Bergen offered early encouragement to pursue my interest in Lashkar at a time, well before the 2008 Mumbai attacks, when many did not view it as a major player in the jihadi movement. When I was ready to make my first field research trip, he also opened up his rolodex to me.

I conducted scores of interviews in India and Pakistan as well as various Western countries, speaking with many people who have become all-too-familiar with the costs of political violence. I am deeply grateful to all those who graciously offered me their knowledge and spoke of their experiences. I took more from them than I could hope to give back, and offer my thanks here once again. I was welcomed warmly everywhere I went and particularly so in Pakistan, where I conducted the majority of my field research. Although this book is sometimes critical of Pakistan's policies this is not reflective of its people, who have been held captive to forces beyond their control for much of the country's short history. Of the many people recommended to me in Pakistan, no one was more helpful than Mohammad Amir Rana. As a former journalist and now the director of the Pak Institute for Peace Studies, Amir has a comprehensive grasp of the history of jihadi militancy in Pakistan. He was both a willing tutor and a warm host, opening the Institute to me as a base of operations as well as allowing me access to the archived material that staff members collected over the years. Mubashir Bukhari acted as my compass in Lahore, and was of great help with the research I conducted there. I also benefited from my
