or TIM]. Although announced by Abu Masood, the three key figures present at the meeting establishing TIM were Jalees Ansari, Azam Ghouri and Abdul Karim who was known as 'Tunda.'[112] During its early years, the TIM confined itself to parading recruits around the grounds of the Young Men's Christian Association [YMCA] and training with lathis.[113] Then, in December 1992, Hindu chauvinists demolished the Babri Masjid [Mosque of Babur], which had been constructed by the first Mughal Emperor of India [Babur] in the sixteenth century. Approximately two thousand people, mostly Muslims, were killed in the communal riots in Mumbai [Bombay at the time] and Gujarat which followed the demolition of the mosque. Not long before the riots, Hafiz Saeed had dispatched Mohammad Azam Cheema, a former colleague from the University of Engineering and Technology, to spearhead Lashkar's recruitment drive inside India. Thus Cheema, known as 'Baba' to his recruits, arrived just before these communal tensions erupted into violence.[114] After the demolition of the Babri Masjid, TIM's leaders decided the time for parade-ground drills was over and that it was time to fight what they saw as the threat from rising Hindu chauvinism. Ansari, Ghouri and Tunda subsequently joined Lashkar, contributing to its network in India during the 1990s and making TIM the initial block on which Lashkar's Indian operations were built.

A year to the day after the Babri Masjid's destruction, Ansari, Ghouri and Tunda executed the first Lashkar-supported attacks in mainland India: a series of coordinated bombings in several cities. Most of the explosions were small, but two people were killed and the ability to execute coordinated blasts illustrated the group's discipline and skill.[115] These bombings should not be confused with those perpetrated by Dawood Ibrahim, the Muslim leader of South Asia's largest crime syndicate known as D-company, who also was outraged by the destruction of the Babri Masjid. Ibrahim worked with the ISI to engineer a far more lethal series of bomb blasts in Bombay in March 1993, which killed hundreds of people.[116] Ibrahim relocated his organization's headquarters to Karachi following these attacks, where he is believed to have strengthened his alliance with the ISI and developed ties to Lashkar, some of whose activities he began financing. D-company operates primarily in Pakistan, India and the United Arab Emirates, and Ibrahim is also said to have begun providing Lashkar operatives with access to his smuggling routes as well as assisting Lashkar
