with the recruitment of Indian members.[117] This is particularly notable given that D-Company also had a presence in Bangladesh, Nepal and several Gulf countries, which were natural transit points for travel between India and Pakistan. In addition to smuggling people, D-Company's networks were also used to traffic weapons and move money via the hawala system.[118] Thus, although Lashkar was not involved in the blasts perpetrated by Ibrahim, it clearly benefited from his arrival in Pakistan. Even more important was the group's relationship with the army and ISI from the mid-1990s onwards. Military training in bombmaking and reconnaissance as well as ISI assistance infiltrating and exfiltrating operatives into and out of India subsequently played a major role in augmenting Lashkar's lethality. According to one Lashkar operative who operated extensively in India during the 2000s, the ISI provided him one-on-one instruction in surveillance techniques, which he considered much more scientific and effective than the instruction given to him during the Daura-e-Ribat.[119]

Not long after the initial wave of attacks, Ansari was captured in the midst of planning a second series of bombings scheduled to coincide with India's Republic Day celebrations in January 1994.[120] Tunda escaped to Bangladesh and Ghouri to Saudi Arabia, though both later came back to India. Tunda headed Lashkar's operations in Bangladesh during the mid-1990s, and became a conduit for recruits transiting from or through Bangladesh to its camps. Among those Tunda sent to Pakistan for training was Sheikh Abdur Rahman, who founded the Jamaat-ul-Mujahideen Bangladesh [JMB] in 1998. Rahman had previously been a member of Harkat-ul-Jihadal-Islami Bangladesh [HUJI-B], the Bangladeshi branch of the Deobandi organization by the same name in Pakistan. He met Hafiz Saeed and other Lashkar leaders during his stay in Pakistan, where the group trained him on the use of small arms and explosives as well as instructing him on how to build a jihadi organization. Rahman wanted to wage a near enemy jihad against the government in Bangladesh, and after he returned there fell out with Tunda over the latter's insistence on using available jihadi assets in Bangladesh for the struggle against India.[121] Lashkar also began building networks in Nepal, which the group has since used to provide passports, cash and communications facilities for operatives transiting between Pakistan and India.[122]
