lands in India. In addition to hearing this information in person, the recruit also described the profusion of propaganda offerings such as Voice of Islam, Tayyabba and Ghazwa Times at various Lashkar offices in the Gulf.[141] Indian Muslims working in the region were, and continue to be, recruited for the very same reasons as Indian Muslims living in India: to assist with or prosecute terror attacks against their homeland. Some recruits were sent to Pakistan for training and then back to India to become part of an underground cell. Others joined Lashkar's support networks in the Gulf, Bangladesh or Nepal to help facilitate the movement of men, money and material. When recruits transited to Pakistan for training, the journey often was (and remains) a circuitous one. In some instances, Indians recruited in India were sent to the Gulf and from there began the journey to training camps in Pakistan or Pakistan-administered Kashmir. Although a more recent example, alleged statements made by another captured Indian operative, Fahim Ansari, to the Indian security services illustrates how these networks function.[142]

Ansari was born in Mumbai, India and claims to have openly expressed his desire to participate in jihad on several occasions, thus marking him out to recruiters. During a trip back to India from Dubai, where he had moved in 2005, Ansari was introduced to a Pakistani-trained member of Lashkar. This individual provided Ansari with false identity papers, told him to return to Dubai and to work there until he received further instructions. A second Lashkar member contacted Ansari following his return to Dubai and the two met a week later. After an initial attempt to leave Dubai en route to Pakistan failed, Ansari was given the phone number of a Karachi-based member named Mohammad Jassem [a.k.a. Tehsin] with whom he remained in contact thereafter. In December 2006, on Jassem's instructions, Ansari collected money from a shop and prepared to meet yet another Lashkar operative named Ilias who would arrange his illegal infiltration into Pakistan. After meeting Ilias the two crossed into Muscat, the capital of Oman, via Abu Dhabi, where Ansari lodged with a group of Pakistanis. He was brought to an Iranian who took him via ship to the port of Bandar Abbas in Iran, from where Ansari transited to Pakistan across the border and eventually reached Karachi. Upon doing so he contacted Jassem who took him the remainder of the way to the Bait-ul-Mujahideen office in Muzaffarabad.[143] Such a circuitous route was necessary for an Indian
