Hundreds of schools, especially girls' schools were destroyed by bombing by TTP miscreants in all areas under their control. Even in December 2011, when there was a lot of news about negotiations with the TTP, they continued destroying the schools. For example, on 28 December, they destroyed a government girls' primary school with explosives in the Somnat area of Shabqadar in Charsadda district, KP. The school building was completely destroyed in the blast. Similarly, the terrorists blew up two schools in Chilas area of Diamer (The Daily Times, 2011).

In Swat, Maulana Fazlullah had been trying to enforce its writ by similar tactics, including closing down barbershops, CDs and music shops and girls' schools. His militants had been destroying or occupying government buildings and blowing up bridges. The basic health units and hotels, electricity and gas installations had been bombed and road blockades and checkpoints were set up. Beheadings of personnel of security forces and police and political rivals were common. Bodies of people slain overnight were dumped in the morning by the roadside everywhere in Swat (The News International, 2009).

The TTP stifled dissent with an iron hand as its henchmen assassinated about 146 moderate clerics for opposing suicide bombing and violence carried out by the TTP (CNBC, 2012). In 2010, the battle lines were drawn and were firmly in place. TTP militants carried out suicide attacks and bomb blasts in South Waziristan, targeting the opponents to make it clear that in the tribal belt they could not tolerate even the slightest divergence from their rigid views. They started targeting people who were not entirely sympathetic to the Taliban cause. On 24 August 2010, a teenager carried out a suicide attack inside a mosque in Wana during Ramadan. At least 25 people were killed, but the primary target appeared to have been Maulana Noor Mohammad, a former MNA, who was elected on a JUI-F ticket. The JUI-F was not unsympathetic to the Taliban command, and Maulana Noor Mohammad had in the past personally brokered 'peace deals' between militants and the state. Obviously, Maulana was not opposed outright to the Taliban frame of mind. But he was killed simply because he looked askance in the presence of Uzbek militias. The message from the militants, like the warning issued by George Bush in 2001, was clear: you are either with us or against us. Not even a note of dissent was acceptable to the insurgents and there was no room for 'moderates' (Dawn, 2010).
