In 2009, Ayman al-Zawahiri, wrote a treatise on the Constitution of Pakistan titled, The Morning and the Lamp (Terrorism Monitor, 2010),[3] which was originally in Arabic (Al Sabah wal Qandeel) but was translated into English and Urdu. The Urdu version (Spaida Sahar aur Timtamata Chiragh) was printed and circulated in Pakistan in 2010. Luckily, the Special Branch of Punjab Police noted this circulation and the Home Department Punjab banned it upon its information.[4] Al Qaeda's brochures and booklets containing Osama bin Laden's messages and criticism of the Pakistan Army and government were also found in circulation in Lahore, Gujranwala, Karachi and many other cities of Pakistan. Ironically, none of the agencies succeeded in locating the elements involved in its printing and circulation.

Similarly, the funding and financing of this campaign remained unknown. It could be safely said that none of the agencies made serious efforts to find these facts to control the campaign.

Al Qaeda's propaganda media organ Al-Sahab released a video in Urdu language for Pakistani audience. It contained malicious propaganda against the government of Pakistan, its leaders, police, intelligence agencies and army. It showed the terrorists who carried out attacks on the ISI office in Lahore. It aimed to influence the people of Pakistan, to create hatred against the government and the US and to inculcate sympathy for Al Qaeda and its ideology.[5]

Al Qaeda issued its monthly magazine Al-Hitteen as hard copies. It was available online and also had email addresses idaraa.hitteen@yahoo.com and idaraa.hitteen@gmail.com (Hitteen, 2012). Hitteen was named after the battle where Saladin Ayubi defeated the Crusaders in 1187 (The Express Tribune, 2012). On the title page of the magazine was written, 'harbinger of global jehad'. Al-Malahem Media Foundation published it. The basic publication on the internet was in Arabic. It also had English and Urdu versions. Al-Malahem published other magazines also, namely Al-Fajr and Inspire (Hitteen, 2011). The hard copy of Hitteen distributed in Pakistan was in Urdu. It is a perfect propaganda document that could incite people against the government of Pakistan, its army and the US. In Issue V, its first article declared the Pakistan Army as the stooge of the 'infidels', which was still being run on British pattern and involved in the massacre of Muslims in FATA and elsewhere. It gave permission to murder Muslims in specific circumstances (Hitteen, 2012). The circulation of Hitteen by post was not wide and
