Shahidullah Shahid while talking to The News correspondent from an undisclosed location (The News International, 2014).

It was worth noting that usually none of the groups under the TTP umbrella had a separate spokesperson who made announcements or interacted with the journalists. Only the spokesperson of the main TTP, led by Baitullah, Hakimullah and later on by Fazlullah, employed this tactic.

TERRORISM FINANCING

Like conventional armies, insurgents need a sustained supply of money to survive and thrive. TTP raised funds from various sources, but unlike Al Qaeda, it had a substantial source of domestic financial support. The primary known sources of the Taliban's wealth were financial support by Al Qaeda, looting of supplies from NATO convoys, kidnapping for ransom, extortion, drug money, bank robberies, donations from its sympathisers and alleged financial help by India.

The Pakistan Army estimated that a sum of $200 million was pumped into the Tehreek-e-Taliban Pakistan's (TTP) coffers from the Afghan drug trade, although there is no real way to ascertain the exact number because of the widespread use of the 'hawala' system. According to the UNODC's World Drug Report 2012, up to '$30 billion worth of narcotics are smuggled from Afghanistan, via Pakistan, to other parts of the world annually' (Kasuri, 2013).

According to some senior intelligence and law enforcement officials, 20 per cent of TTP funding came from crimes (including kidnappings and bank robberies); 50 per cent came from donations and extortions and the remaining 30 per cent was drug money. TTP operated through a network of affiliates such as the Harkat-ul Mujahideen and Al-Badr Mujahideen in its areas of influence and through a countrywide underground network of sleeper cells, financiers, facilitators, sympathisers and affiliates that helped the organisation achieve its intended objectives through vital financing (Kasuri, 2013).

According to an intelligence officer, 50 kidnappings daily became routine in KP at one point. Even a close relative of Inspector General Islamabad Kaleem Imam was ransomed for Rs 5 million ($59,571) after being kidnapped from Peshawar. The same thing happened to the Vice-Chancellor of Kohat University (Kasuri, 2013).
