could not be achieved through the operations was the neutralisation of safe havens and supply lines (Ihasanullah, 2011).

Operation Kalosha II (2004)

In early 2004, the Pakistani intelligence community gathered reports of increased Al Qaeda activities in Wana. Later, in March, the army launched a 13-day cordon and search operation Kalosha when the Frontier Corps (FC) personnel were ambushed in Wana. The Pakistani forces faced stiff resistance, and the operation that started with 700 troops fortified later with a total of 7,000 army and FC soldiers. The operation succeeded in eliminating local and foreign militants and unearthing a network of tunnels containing sophisticated electronic equipment and supplies. Al Qaeda command and control centre was also dismantled (Fair & Seth, 2010). The Shakai agreement brokered after operation Kalosha in March 2004.

Operation Al-Mizan (11–13 June 2004)

A strong force of 10,000 army troops, US-trained Special Operations Task Force and FC attacked more than 200 Chechens, Uzbeks and Arabs with hundreds of local supporters in Shakai at a distance of 25 km from Wana. Mounting casualties convinced the military into striking the Sargodha peace deal with militants in February 2005 (Fair & Seth, 2010).

Operation Tri-Star (January 2008)

The Pakistan Army launched a three-part operation in January 2008 in FATA against the Pakistani Taliban. Operation 'Tri-Star' was launched to contain the threat from Baitullah Mehsud after attacks on military forts in SWA in January 2008. Operation Zalzala was the part of the operation Tri-Star. The operation proved successful in regaining strategic areas of Laddah, Makin, Spinkai Raghzai, Kotkai and Tiarza (Gunaratna & Bukhari, 2008).

Operation Al-Mizan (2002–6)

Operation 'Al-Mizan' comprised several smaller military operations, including Operation 'Kalosha II', which was carried out in South Waziristan. Pakistan forces employing local informants identified more than 70 Ahmadzai Wazir tribesmen who were harbouring and supporting foreign fighters. The main success of the operation was
