The Taliban commander Taasil Khan based in Shakai, South Waziristan was shifted to Pindi CMH by a military helicopter after becoming the target of bomb blast planted by unknown miscreants (Wazir, 2012). This incident witnessed by many residents of South Waziristan left masses unable to identify their real enemy.

The people who were affected by the terrorist activities were encouraged by the state to form a group to fight against the terrorists in their areas. They were supported and armed by the army for this purpose. They were also given awards and honours. Some were also provided with material and logistic support. However, these civilians had to face the wrath of terrorists, especially when the lashkars became strong or the army withdrew its support to them. A total of 25 militia men were brutally killed by the Taliban in Upper Dir District. The government did not provide security to these militia men and left them vulnerable. Once they were armed, they were safe, but they had to be disarmed after the expiry of their temporary employment as security personnel (Wazir, 2012).

Sadly, the government of Pakistan never compensated these affected people. Saadullah and Raza Khan and many others like them purchased their own wheelchairs. 'The government just used us and left us in the lurch', Saadullah said. The media covered the story of 25 people who were slain by militants but the aftermath of the event was overlooked. The families of temporary soldiers were not compensated. One of the cousins of Raza Khan left the permanent military employment after one of his relatives was disregarded by Pakistan (Wazir, 2012).

There are instances when local people, especially in Bajaur Agency and Mohmand Agency, were compelled to fight against the militants in their area. In the vicinity of Mandal in Bajaur, security forces compelled ten locals to provide for the security of each specified area. They were forced to patrol at nights. In one of their activities, Taliban abducted ten patrolling tribesmen including Abdullah, a schoolteacher, at midnight. Taliban chopped off Abdullah's ear while threatening the other tribesmen to refrain from patrolling the area.

However, the civilians could not give up patrolling under the pressure of the security forces. After a few days, Abdullah was killed brutally by the militants. The security forces did not compensate the family of the slain tribesman.

These are a few instances among thousands of such cases in FATA and north of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa where civilians became the victims in
