– But ironically until the beginning of 2012 when there were a lot of speculations and counter-clarifications regarding peace talks with the terrorists, the TTP continued its heinous and cruel activities. It executed 15 paramilitary Frontier Corps on 4 January 2012 who were captured from a check post. Their naked bodies were found in the town of Shiwa in the Miramshah area. They were captured on 22 December after a Taliban force assaulted a fort in the settled district of Tank, which borders South Waziristan. One soldier was killed during the assault. The next day, seven Frontier Corps troopers were killed in a suicide attack in the settled district of Bannu (Roggio, 2012). Peshawar faced a new wave of terrorism in February 2012. A total of 13 people died in a suicide attack at Kohat Bus Stand on 23 February 2012. On the next day, three suicide bombers targeted a police station in Peshawar, in which four police personnel died. On the same day, a militant was injured while planting an IED near the road (Dawn TV, 2012).
– The TTP spokesperson, Ehsanullah Ehsan, said that these 15 soldiers were executed in retaliation to a Pakistani military operation in the Khyber tribal agency on 1 January that killed 12 Taliban. Amongst those killed in Khyber was Qari Kamran, a senior commander in Nowshera who was responsible for the murders of scores of Pakistani soldiers, policemen and civilians in the north-west. He further added that the 22 and 23 December attacks were carried out to avenge the death of Taj Gul Mehsud, a senior deputy to Hakimullah Mehsud, TTP Chief. Taj Gul was killed along with 12 other fighters in a US airstrike in South Waziristan on 26 October (Dawn TV, 2012).
– Previous Pacts: It was essential to review the fate of previous pacts and truces and to find the reasons for their failure. Almost all truces had ended in smoke, resulting in renewed hostilities and skirmishes. The violations were done on one excuse or other. It was enough to predict the likely fate of any new truce.

On the basis of this formula, the peace talks always seemed premature as the terrorists were exerting hard demands and making their presence felt in a strong and brutal manner. Even if talks were held, the government would have to give more than it could take. Even the Prime Minister expressed his apprehensions and cautions when he said that the approach
