THE SHAKAI AGREEMENT

The Shakai deal was a result of the military operation aimed at forcing Nek Muhammad to expel foreign militants or get them registered. The operation was unsuccessful and the army faced stiff resistance and heavy casualties. As a part of the Shakai agreement, the government agreed to release Taliban prisoners, pay compensations and give money to Taliban to help them pay their debts to Al Qaeda. In exchange, Nek agreed to get foreign militants registered and stop cross-border attacks and incursions in Afghanistan. The Pakistani security forces were pinning their hopes on the full fruition of the peace deal, but Nek Muhammad reneged on all the clauses of the deal and ended setting up training camps for Al Qaeda and declared war against Pakistan (Behuria, 2007). Soon after signing the deal, Nek started mass massacre of the Maliks only to be stopped by a drone strike.

THE SARAROGHA AGREEMENT (FEBRUARY 2005)

In a hope to halt the spread of Taliban from Ahmad Wazirs areas to Mehsud areas, the military authorities reached an agreement with Baitullah Mehsud in the Sararogha areas of South Waziristan. The main conditions included that the Taliban would be compensated for the damages incurred during military operations and the Baitullah and his coterie of militants would not be targeted by the security forces. In return, Baitullah was not required to lay down weapons or surrender foreign militants in his ranks. The agreement only required Baitullah to cease attacking Pakistani security forces and targets and bring an end to giving shelter to foreign fighters. The peace agreement did not stop skirmishes between militants and security forces, and Talibanisation proliferated unchecked. Baitullah too was killed in a drone attack in August 2009 (Khattak, 2012).

THE SWAT AGREEMENT (MAY 2008)

After the Lal Masjid operation in 2007, Fazlullah attempted to install his brand of Sharia in Swat Valley and took a more violent turn until the civil government came to power after the March 2008 elections, which offered peace talks to Fazlullah and his supporters. After a flurry of peace
