Section 14 of these regulations provided setting up of an oversight board comprising two civilians and two military officers to review cases of each person interned within a period of time not exceeding 120 days from the issuance of the order of internment. The laws also empower the authority to set up notified internment centres.

Furthermore, the misuse of force during actions in aid of civil power had been prohibited. According to Section 5 (1) of the regulations: 'If any abuse or misuse of the use of force during action in aid of civil power is alleged or attributed to any member of the armed forces, the same shall be investigated within the hierarchy of the armed forces.'

The lawyers of Peshawar High Court termed the regulations repugnant to the injunctions of Islam and the Constitution of 1973 (Dawn, 2011). There had been voices urging to repeal or withdraw these ordinances (Wazir, 2013). However, as long as the insurgents and terrorists would be active, the government and the army might not like to withdraw these ordinances. The laws termed to be draconian definitely earned popular resentment. In Northern Ireland, the civil rights movement of the late 1960s rallied against the Special Powers Act of 1922 that had given quite draconian powers to the civil authorities of the Stormont government. The internment policy of the British government and the techniques employed to interrogate prisoners was considered a violation of human rights. 'By 1975 the British government had dropped the policy, however, in the face of its manifest failure and replaced it with what were known as the Diplock Courts, which replace trial by jury with trial by a single judge for terrorist offenses' (Koch, 2007).

Conversely, neither new anti-terrorism law was introduced nor was the old Anti-Terrorism Act, 1997, amended in Pakistan until 2013. This disequilibrium was not understandable. It showed that insurgency was getting all attention, which was being handled by the army, but terrorism was let loose to wreak havoc across Pakistan. No strategy and no laws were formulated to handle it. Public pressure on the successive governments to do something to bridle terrorism failed to lead to the introduction of anti-terrorism legislation. Nevertheless, in 2014, amendments were brought about in ATA, 1997, and a new law, Protection of Pakistan, 2014, was enacted, followed by National Action Plan, which showed determination of the new government of Muhammad Nawaz Sharif, elected in 2013, to tackle the terrorists with all available tools, including negotiations, laws and military operations.
