The uncoordinated 'bits and pieces' effort affected security service delivery across a broad spectrum of likely targets, and the government's apathy persisted.

SWOT analysis of the situation can help understand the security situation and the need for CT strategy (see Table 7.2).

In light of the above, it was strongly recommended that the federal government should have devised a coherent, comprehensive and robust counter-terrorism strategy. National Assembly was the arena where the outline of the much needed CT strategy could be discussed and devised.

PROPOSED COUNTER-TERRORISM STRATEGY

Pakistan had its peculiar circumstances; therefore, innovation and initiative were required to devise a counter-terrorism strategy.[5] This strategy could be associated with the following four main activities:

Table 7.2 SWOT analysis of the situation.

Strengths	Weaknesses
• Army operations against the insurgents in Swat and Waziristan were quite successful • Trained law enforcement agencies and intelligence agencies had the potential to face the terrorists • People became wary of terrorists and wanted peace • World wanted Pakistan to overcome terrorism	• Fluctuation in political will • Lack of understanding • Lack of bureaucratic will • Army leading the fight • Disjointed intelligence role • No national CT strategy • No provincial CT strategy
Opportunities	Threats
• International support • Indigenous support • Learn lessons from others • Opportune time to strike	• Terrorism might not end soon • Foreign investments will remain low • Economy will suffer more • Social split will become wider • Political instability will increase • Existential threat
