participants. The US started carrying out drone attacks to neutralise Al Qaeda members in Waziristan who desire to attack US interests. As the drone attacks had been targeting the militants on Pakistan's soil, collateral damage of non-militant Pakistanis was obvious. The collateral damage caused by these drone attacks made the people of Pakistan party to it. The resentment and reaction of the Pakistani public pulled the government of Pakistan as well and they kept denying its approval of the drone campaign. It further complicated affairs and resentment against the US and even the government of Pakistan increased in the public. The drone campaign represented by an eight-arrow graph explains this situation (see Figure 8.1).

It would become simpler if arrows are reduced. The policy should be to appease these parties. One simple and straight solution was to allow Pakistan control of the drone campaign. It would put an end to violation in Pakistan (one arrow gone). Moreover, it would give some semblance of morality, legality and legitimacy to this campaign, which was considered unlawful and arbitrary by many quarters within the US as well as operated far from the battlefield and violated the right to due process. The New York Times revealed that President Obama was making the final decision on 'the biggest killing and drone strikes'. He relied on his counter-terrorism adviser, John Brennan (Editorial, International Herald Tribune, 2012).

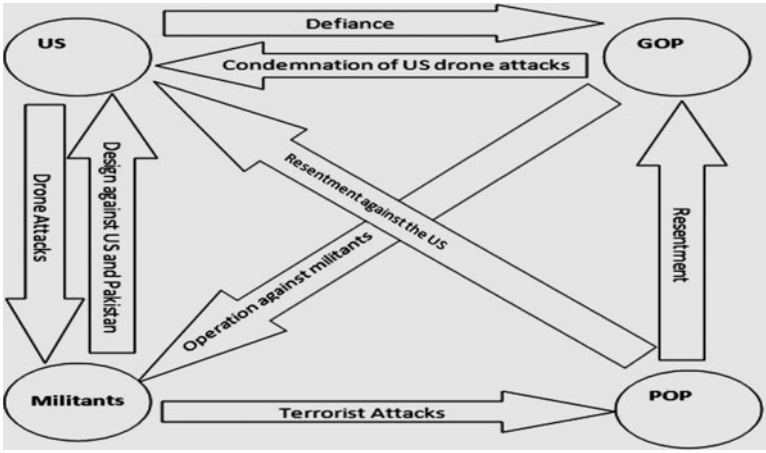

Figure 8.1 An eight-arrow scenario.