Pakistanis see the US through its role in Iraq and Afghanistan, which they consider an attack on Muslims resulting in mass-scale killings of innocent people. The reports that the US and the UK concocted evidence of WMDs in Iraq further nourished these views. The second reason was more localised; drone attacks resulting in killing of innocent people in FATA. The third reason was the ever-increasing US tilt towards India reflected by its deal on a nuclear programme and billions of dollars worth of weapons contracts during Hillary Clinton's visit to India (The Nation, 2009).

In fact, Pakistan and the US had a long history of profound mistrust. Historically speaking, many Pakistanis considered the US as unfriendly and unreliable because of three complaints by them: (1) Washington's refusal to help Pakistan during the 1965 war with India; (2) the US's discarding of Pakistan 'like a Kleenex' when it was no longer needed after the Afghan War and (3) the indiscriminatory nature of the US nuclear sanctions, which – until the May 1998 nuclear tests – hit only Pakistan and did not affect India (Kux, 2001).

A myth was linked to this feeling that the US wanted to take out Pakistan's nuclear bombs. This indication was enough to stir the adverse sensibilities of most Pakistanis who considered the nuclear programme as their pride and strength to be equal to and be secure from arch rival India. They found an Indo-Israel nexus behind this conspiracy.

Mike Muller said, 'We actually sanctioned Pakistan from about 1990 to 2002. And so they're wary of what is going to be our sustained position' (The Nation, 2009). Adding to this wariness was the allegation that the US was funding the late TTP founder leader Baitullah Mehsud to destabilise Pakistan (Asian Tribune, 2009).

A new dip in Pak-US relations came after the killing of Osama at Abbottabad. Prior to that, the issue of Raymond Davis, the security contractor based at the US Consulate General Lahore, who gunned down by two Pakistanis in broad day light in Lahore, caused bitterness in the relations. Raymond Davis claimed that he had fired at the youngsters because they could mug him at gun point. However, the circumstantial evidence did not support his claim. He had fired at them repeatedly from inside his car. The bullets pierced through the screen of the car and hit the motorcycle riders at vital points. Both died on the spot. Both were armed with pistols, but they neither took out the pistols nor fired any shot. The rescue team that rushed from the US Consulate General to
