These reasons were enough for the people and the government of Pakistan to keep India on top of its security priorities even if the fires of internal terrorism became too hot to burn Pakistan internally.

According to the 2010 Global Attitudes Project report released by PEW Research Centre, the people of Pakistan saw India as a greater threat to their country than the Taliban or Al Qaeda, with 74 per cent viewing India as a serious threat, 54 per cent considering the Taliban and 38 per cent Al Qaeda. Interestingly in 2010, as opposed to soaring anti-US sentiments, Pakistanis became somewhat less concerned about the threat posed by India than they were in 2009, when 83 per cent considered India a serious threat. A large proportion, 72 per cent, in fact, supported improved relations with their neighbour and also favoured greater economic and political ties between the two countries (The Daily Times, 2010). These sentiments remained unchanged in subsequent years. However, the arrest of an Indian Naval officer Kulbhushan Jadhav in 2016, who was operating at the behest of Indian intelligence agency RAW from Balochistan ignited the situation again. It was tangible evidence of India's interference in Pakistan.
