Progression

1. Despite persistent decade-long military operations, insurgency has not ended.
2. Terrorist activities have become more lethal. Places such as Army HQ in Rawalpindi and Naval bases had been targeted. There were international apprehensions about terrorist intentions and increasing prowess to lay their hands on Pakistan's nuclear weapons.
3. Umpteen jihadi, religious and sectarian parties radicalised a large part of the society who do not look at the insurgents and terrorists unfavourably, who claim to be striving for the enforcement of Sharia in Pakistan.

Impact

1. Pakistan lost billions of dollars due to terrorism. Foreign investors were scared away. Even local big investors feel unsafe due to killings and kidnappings. 'It was documented that cumulatively terrorism had cost Pakistan around 33.02 per cent of its real national income, for instance, terrorism costs Pakistan around 1 per cent of real GDP per capita growth every year' (Mehmood, 2013).
2. Many Western countries considered FATA as the metropolis of militants where locals, Middle Easterners, Chechens, Uzbeks and even some Westerners got training and designed plans to carry out attacks. Many Western airlines stopped operating to Pakistan. They issued travel advisories to their nationals. International media highlighted the news of militants and terrorists linked with Al Qaeda and TTP, which created a negative image of Pakistan.
3. Law and order situation had hit the bottom due to frequent bomb blasts, suicide attacks and gun and grenade attacks in cities on markets, offices, schools, military and civil forces in big cities for the last ten years. Kidnappings and extortions added to the insecurity of the people. Well-off people living in big cities preferred to live in gated colonies.
4. Dissensions and differences cropped up in the society. There were differences between the liberals and religious extremists; Sunnis and
