Pakistani militants to coordinate with each other and 'avoid unwarranted killings and kidnappings for ransom'. Al-Libi asked the Pakistani militants to provide additional fighters to the Afghan Taliban in March, when the spring fighting season begins. TTP spokesperson Ehsanullah Ehsan said that the militants agreed, but that did not mean the group would end its fight against the Pakistani government (Roggio, 2012).

In its wake, an escalation was witnessed in the terrorist activities, especially in KP areas. A total of 15 soldiers of FC, who were kidnapped, were killed on 4 January 2012. In another incident, 20 people were killed and 30 were injured in a vehicle-based IED (VBIED) attack in the main bazaar of Jamrud, Khyber Agency, on 10 January. 2012.[3] On 23 February 2012, a VBIED, packed with about 45 kg high-explosive, went off at Kohat Bus Stand, resulting in 12 deaths and 32 injuries.[4]

The death of Waliur Rehman Mehsud, the second most important commander of dreaded Tehreek-e-Taliban Pakistan, in a drone attack on 29 May 2013 was one of the hardest blows to TTP after the death of the founder Chief of TTP Baitullah Mehsud.[5] It was the prized scalp. The missile fired by the drone had targeted a house in the Chashma Pul area near Miramshah, South Waziristan, which resulted in the death of Waliur Rehman along with five other accomplices including two Uzbek nationals. They had returned from a meeting of the central committee (Majlis-e-Shura) of TTP.

Waliur Rehman Mehsud was an astute planner who reportedly masterminded attacks on the Islamabad Marriot Hotel and on CIA setups in Khost, Afghanistan. Logically, the society should have been much relieved about the death of an unrepentant terrorist having a long blood-spattered record of destruction and mayhem. Sadly, there was hardly a whimper of satisfaction by the media and the official quarters. Conversely, a deafening uproar was unleashed on the violation of our territorial sovereignty.

This confounding situation remained the deepest dilemma of Pakistan, which has perpetually persisted since 2002. Terrorists had killed about 50,000 citizens, soldiers, policemen, intelligence personnel and paramilitary forces; damaged the economy and shattered the social fabric, but the people have persistently ignored them and stubbornly refused to pin point the enemy. Sun Tzu, the ancient Chinese philosopher and strategist, had emphasised, 'Know thy enemy' if you have to win the war. Nevertheless, Pakistan's policymakers didn't care a
