implementation of Shariah.' Similarly, Maulvi Fazlullah of Swat, Chief of TTP, made it clear that he would extend his writ across Pakistan. It is a matter of grave concern that religio-political parties of Pakistan have the same objective, that is, to strive for imposition of Sharia in Pakistan. Axiomatically, both have sympathy for each other and in many ways they support each other.

TTP's terrorist activities decreased in urban areas after Operation 'Zarb-e-Azb', but did not come to a halt, rather the lethality increased. There is strong apprehension that their surreptitious ingress in these areas might increase through their ever-increasing sympathisers, supporters and sleeper agents. They would acquire the capability to strike as and when required. Whenever the government would slacken the control in FATA, TTP would enhance its ingress, especially in North and South Waziristan. After stabilising themselves in their home ground, they would expand their activities to the settled areas of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa. The impact would be felt across Pakistan, where the like-minded and the linked religious extremists, many of them members and activists of religio-political parties, would take a cue and press harder for their share in the government and to compel to adopt their style of Islam in Pakistan.

The Pakistan government, its agencies and public have a tendency to play down the seriousness of threats as soon the frequency of terrorist acts diminishes. They should learn the lesson from the tenacity of the US, which kept its guard up and showed no slackness in protective measures; therefore, hardly any notable terrorist incident took place after the 9/11 attack. Furthermore, it continued to make the security procedures and processes more stringent and effective. For example, although the Obama administration claimed to be close to defeating Al Qaeda, the size of the government's secret list of suspected terrorists banned from flying to or within the US more than doubled in 2011. The no-fly list jumped from about 10,000 known or suspected terrorists in 2010 to about 21,000 by the end of 2011 (Sullivan, 2012). Pakistan needed to follow this hardline and systematic approach to counter terrorism.

Usually, counter-terrorism (CT) measures targeted specifically the leadership, including arrests, assassinations as well as efforts to disrupt communications and to force the leaders into long-term inactivity and bear important influence on the terrorist organisation (Gutfraind, 2009).
