in the public gatherings of the Muslim League at Lucknow. It became popular although it was not the part of any party's manifesto or any resolution (Qazi, 2009).

His letter to Pir of Manki Sharif further confirmed Jinnah's consonance with Iqbal's views in November 1945 to allay his apprehensions with regard to the role of religion in Pakistan:

> It is needless to emphasize that the constituent assembly which would be predominantly Muslim in its composition would be able to enact laws for Muslims, not inconsistent with the Shariat laws and the Muslims will no longer be obliged to abide by the un-Islamic laws.

However, it is clear that Jinnah did not want a theocratic state run by mullahs.

In a broadcast to the people of the US recorded in February 1948, Jinnah made his point clear:

> In any case, Pakistan is not going to be a theocratic state to be ruled by priests with a divine mission. We have many non-Muslims – Hindus, Christians and Parsees – but they are all Pakistanis. They will enjoy the same rights and privileges as any other citizens and will play their rightful part in the affairs of Pakistan.

Conversely, the politics of religious identity was exploited by different quarters, with religious elements at the forefront, who started playing with the passions of faith (Ali, 2010). The spirit of 'fundamental principle' of Jinnah started petering out immediately after his death. Inclusion of 'Objective resolution' in the Constitution of Pakistan was considered the first major act in this direction. Although this resolution stopped short of advocating outright theocracy, it was not in consonance with Jinnah's vision (Annexure of Objective Resolution).

General Muhammad Ayub Khan, despite his modern outlook and anti-theocratic approach, could not keep the religious parties out of power for long, as some in his regime cooperated with the Islamists, particularly with the Jamaat-e-Islami, to get the support of the Arab countries over the Kashmir issue. He had deleted 'Islamic' from
