Pakistan's official name in the initial version of the 1962 Constitution and had instead used 'Republic of Pakistan', but after pressure from the religious parties, the official name 'Islamic Republic of Pakistan' was restored. Ayub Khan also used the religious parties when he contested the presidential election in 1965. The opposition parties had nominated Fatima Jinnah, Muhammad Ali Jinnah's sister, as their joint candidate to run against Ayub Khan. Ayub Khan launched a campaign against her, and religious elements were used to issue a fatwa (religious edict) that a woman was not allowed to rule in Islam. However, some religious scholars like Maududi were not part of this campaign (Haqqani, 2010: 44).

Even a modern and so-called secular democratic leader like Zulfikar Ali Bhutto could not maintain the spirit of Jinnah's vision and succumbed to the pressure of religious coterie for political advantages. Nevertheless, it was he who first formally moved towards making Pakistan an Islamic state, although he did this for political reasons to appeal to the Islamists. He banned the sale and use of liquor, prohibited gambling and closed down nightclubs (Hussain, 2007).

When Zulfikar Ali Bhutto parted ways with his mentor General Ayub Khan, president of Pakistan, he formed the Pakistan Peoples Party and started gaining popularity, thriving on socialist slogans. The anti-Bhutto forces adopted the strategy to relying on Islamic slogans and rhetoric to keep their existence and popularity intact. Nawabzada Sher Ali Khan, who was the information minister during General Yahya Khan's martial law, coined the term 'Nazria-e-Pakistan' (ideology of Pakistan; Nizami, 2010), which became popular and is still considered as if it were coined before the creation of Pakistan.

General Zia-ul-Haq, taking advantage of the hype created by the Islamists who were encouraged by the decisions taken by Bhutto, overthrew the democratic government of Prime Minister Zulfikar Ali Bhutto and relied on the religion and the religious parties to legitimise and perpetuate his rule. 'There was a complete convergence of interests between the Islamists and the military leadership which had ousted the Bhutto government' (Hussain, 2007). In return, these religious parties, seeking similar foothold in the society, propagated that Pakistan was created in the name of Islam and it was an ideological state. In this process, the original history, concepts and visions were muddled and muted. An interesting episode of those days paints the situation quite
