In conclusion, it can be summarised that Pakistan was not created to be a violent and religiously bigoted country. The founder of Pakistan envisioned it to be a liberal Muslim country without religious or political bias. Some situations, mainly the CIA-sponsored Afghan war, made it into the quagmire of religious extremism. 'Religion has been deployed cynically and instrumentally for political ends, not only by the politico-religious elements, such as the Jamaat-e-Islami (JI) or Jamiat Ulema-e Islam (JUI), but also by liberal-secular rulers of both civil and military regimes' (Bennett, 2009). Moreover, the policy of using proxies for Kashmir and Afghanistan initiated religious extremism, and military rulers were mainly responsible for this fiasco. This chapter gives a vivid picture of the constant religious extremism throughout Pakistan, both before and after independence. Except for the vision of Quaid-e-Azam, there has been an ever-increasing influence of religious elements on the policies, practices and laws of the country, which resulted in the subsequent phases of religious extremism and terrorism in Pakistan.
