forces, particularly with Al Qaeda, that operated against the Pakistani state and the NATO forces in Afghanistan (Hussain, 2007).

In 2016, it was blamed for its involvement in the terrorist attack on Pathankot Air Force Station in India. However, the investigations remained inconclusive as the Pakistani investigation team, led by a senior officer of the Pakistan Police Service, was not given full access and evidence in India.

JAMAAT-UD-DAWA (JuD)/LASHKAR-E-TAIBA (LeT)

Many stories have been told about the origin of Lashkar-e-Taiba (LeT) 'Army of the Pure'. The official story is that first of all, Markaz al-Dawa-wal-Irshad (Center for Preaching and Guidance, or MDI) was formed in 1984 in Afghanistan. Later, Maasker Tayyaba (military training camp) was formed at Kunar, Afghanistan. It was a training camp for the Mujahideen who wanted to fight against the Soviet forces in Afghanistan. According to some researchers, Zaki-ur-Rehman Lakhvi formed this small group of Ahl-e-Hadith[4] Muslims from Pakistan to wage jihad against Soviet forces in Afghanistan. The official version denied it and clarified in an interview that MDI and Maasker were founded by Hafiz Muhammad Saeed, a teacher at the University of Engineering and Technology (Lahore) in 1990.[5]

MDI was responsible for dawa (preaching) and LeT for jihad. It had several training camps in the eastern Afghanistan provinces of Kunar and Paktia, both of which had a substantial number of Ahl-e-Hadith (Wahabi) Muslims, with the aim of participating in the jihad against the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. Its leadership gained the trust of the Pakistani intelligence establishment. A year later, Hafiz Mohammed Saeed and Zafar Iqbal, also a teacher at the University of Engineering and Technology (Lahore) Pakistan, formed the Jamaat-ud-Dawa (Organisation for Preaching, or JuD). In 1986, Lakhvi merged his outfit with JuD. In 1989, it turned its attention from Afghanistan and devoted itself to waging jihad in Indian-held Kashmir (IHK). In December 2001, the Jamaat-ud-Dawa (JuD) was launched. However, the US Department of State, which had actually designated the LeT a foreign terrorist organisation in 2002, described the JuD as the 'front organisation' of the Lashkar. JuD's social organ was named Falah-e-Insaniat Foundation (Harrison, 2009).