JuD's headquarters (200 acres) were located at Muridke, 30 km from Lahore, which was built with contributions and donations (SATP, 2009). The headquarters housed a madrasah (seminary), a hospital, a market, a large residential area for 'scholars' and faculty members, a fish farm and agricultural tracts. The LeT also reportedly operated 16 Islamic institutions, 135 secondary schools, an ambulance service, mobile clinics, blood banks and several seminaries across Pakistan. However, in 2009, after the uproar over LeT's alleged involvement in the Mumbai attack, the government of Punjab took control of all the set-ups of JuD and appointed an administrator to run schools and dispensaries.

JuD collected donations from the Pakistani community in the Middle East and from Pakistani and Kashmiri businessmen. Its social organ Falah-e-Insaniat (betterment of mankind) collected charity and sacrificial hides from across Pakistan to generate funds.

According to some sources, JuD also received some funding from the intelligence establishment. Funds also came from some sources in Saudi Arabia.

JuD/LeT was not an underground organisation. It published its views and opinion through its Urdu monthly journal, Al-Dawa and an Urdu weekly, Ghazwa. It also published Voice of Islam (an English monthly), Al-Rabat (an Arabic monthly), Mujala-e-Tulba (an Urdu monthly for students) and Jihad Times (an Urdu weekly). These magazines not only published essays about the jihadi ideology and motivated the younger section to join jihad, but also published reports of the activities of 'Mujahedeen' inside IHK. It published the names and addresses of the Pakistani and Kashmiri Mujahedeen who lost their lives in operations inside IHK. Not only their names were mentioned in the magazines, but the funerals of many of the 'martyred Mujahedeen' were also held in their native towns and cities, which were attended by a large number of people who eulogised their sacrifice and congratulated their parents.

Initially, LeT was focused on jihad against the Soviet forces in Afghanistan. After the Soviet forces moved out of Afghanistan, its primary objective remained the liberation of Kashmir. The recruits were sent for military training on 'Daura-e-Aam' (General visit) for 21 days and on 'Daura-e-Sufa' for religious training for 21 days (Jamestown Foundation, 2012).

After the US attack on Iraq and later on Afghanistan, it turned its focus towards the US as well. However, according to the direction
