Security Council – has considered Lashkar a terrorist organisation affiliated with Al Qaeda. The US and the European Union also approved of the group. By agreeing that Jamaat-ud-Dawa was essentially an alias for Lashkar, the UN panel has significantly added to India's pressure on Pakistan's civilian government to prove that it is cracking down on militant groups and pursuing extremists blamed for the Mumbai attack. Lakhvi was detained during a raid in Pakistan's portion of Kashmir; the mountainous region claimed by both nations has been the focus of two of their three wars since 1947 (The Nation, 2008).[6]

The US announced a $10 million reward for information, leading to the capture of Hafiz Saeed. Strangely or strategically, it was announced in India. Wendy Sherman, then US Under Secretary of State for political affairs, announced the reward for Hafiz Saeed and also announced $2 million for information to capture Hafiz Abdul Rahman Makki, Hafiz Saeed's brother-in-law. The announcement of these bounties by India had a negative impact on Pakistan. Most people considered it a US–India conspiracy to put Pakistan under pressure at the time when Pakistan had stopped the NATO supplies. Rather sympathy for Hafiz Saeed increased in many circles. This decision was considered ridiculous because Hafiz Saeed was neither underground nor was in hiding in remote areas of KP. He was based at Lahore, Punjab. He lived in a small 3 marla house in Johar Town with his family. During the announcement, he was very much present in Lahore and used to attend his party office at Al Qadisia mosque, the Lake Road Lahore, which was in the heart of the city. He regularly led the Friday prayers at Al Qadisia, which were attended by hundreds of followers.

Immediately after the announcement of this reward on Hafiz Saeed, news surfaced that the US ambassador to Pakistan, Cameron Munter, was being called back prematurely before the completion of his tenure of two years. A renowned columnist of Pakistan, Nazir Naji, whose column appeared in the leading Urdu newspaper, Jang, stated that Hafiz Saeed had met Munter and convinced him of his non-involvement in the Mumbai attack. Munter bought his idea and pleaded his case to the US authorities. However, in contrast to his report, the US announced a bounty on Hafiz Saeed and announced that too in India. Munter was upset and decided to quit before the completion of his tenure. Both JuD and the US Embassy in Pakistan rejected this report. The JuD Coordinator was ready to take legal action against Nazir Naji for
