different parts of Pakistan. The man wanted by the US and India for terrorism seemed more of a politician than a terrorist.

In July 2012, when the Defence of Pakistan Council (DPC), a group of more than 40 political and religious parties, launched a long march from Lahore to Islamabad to protest against the restoration of NATO supply, the Punjab government did not allow JuD to establish camps in front of the Punjab Assembly at the Charing Cross, the Mall Road, Lahore. However, this place was routinely used by all groups for all sorts of protests. The police pulled down the JuD camps, which they opposed initially, but dispersed after slogans were raised. Thus, the JuD strategy to move towards mildness and to be gradually more political than a militant was a positive development. However, it also had a negative fallout for the security of Pakistan. Some extremist elements within JuD that did not agree with its new approach detached themselves from it to operate within Pakistan. At least one such case gave credence to this apprehension when unknown armed terrorists attacked the army camp at Wazirabad (industrial town of Punjab), in which seven soldiers of the Pakistan Army were killed on 9 July 2012 (Express Tribune, 2012). Initial investigations confirmed that the attackers were from the splinter group of JuD. This group probably joined hands with TTP and started terrorist activities in Punjab. A JuD office bearer, Col (r) Nazeer, told that all members of JuD were under control and discipline of the party and those who were indulging in such activities were thrown out of the party.[10] The parting of the ways by many dissidents of JuD, trained for jihad, joining hands with terrorists for striking inside Pakistan, could become a palpable security threat, especially in the province of Punjab.

It did become a threat, but in a different way. It launched its political party 'Milli Muslim League' and fielded a candidate for the 2017 by-election of Constituency NA-120. He bagged the second highest number of votes (about 7,000 votes) after the PML (N). It was a remarkable achievement by a religio-political party in the stronghold of Nawaz Sharif-led PML (N). Currently, JuD is under tremendous pressure from abroad and within the country to change its stance and approach.

Hizbul Mujahideen (HM) or the Party of Freedom Fighters, led by Yusuf Shah, alias Pir Syed Salahuddin, affiliated with Jamaat-e-Islami, was considered the mother of militancy in the Indian-held Kashmir. According to Muhammad Ahsan Dar, the founder member of HM, who
