The four objectives of HM are: (1) to create an environment of Jihad among the Muslims of the land to help Muslim brothers in IHK; (2) to create a spirit of Jihad and martyrdom in the hearts of the youth and to help them achieve this by providing spiritual, physical and conceptual training; (3) to provide financial support to those involved in Jihad and the affected people and (4) to help those involved in Jihad to use their strengths in Islamic Renaissance.

The command structure was as follows:

The central command council comprises of seven members that include the Chief Commander. There are three to four battalions at the level of every district and a battalion Commander leads each. Each battalion has three companies led by a Platoon Commander each. Every platoon has three sections with separate Section Commanders. Each section has 11 Mujahideen, a platoon has 33 Mujahideen, a company has 99 and a battalion has 313 Mujahideen (Rana, 2009).

During its heydays, HM was divided into the five divisions for administrative convenience and operational feasibility: the Central division for Srinagar; the southern division of Anantnag and Pulwama districts of Indian-controlled Kashmir; the Chenab division consisting of district Udhampur, the Pir Panjal division consisting of Rajouri and Poonch districts and finally the northern division of Kupwara, Baramulla and Bandipora regions (SATP). It had a substantial support base in the Kashmir Valley and in the Doda, Rajouri and Poonch districts and parts of Udhampur district in the Jammu region (SATP).

Its media centre, Hizb Media Centre, ran its website illustrating its activities, Indian military's actions in Kashmir, killings of Kashmiris and so on (Hibz Media Index, 2013). It had its own news agency, Kashmir Press International, and a women's wing, Banat-ul-Islam.

The head of the group was Syed Salahuddin (real name: Muhammad Yousaf Shah), who also headed Muttahida Jihad Council. Nasir ul Islam, who merged its group 'Ansar ul Islam' into the HM, developed differences with HM and formed his own faction of HM known as 'Hizb ul Mujahideen Nasir Islam Group' (Rana, 2003). It was later changed to Jamiat ul Mujahideen. Soon after this, another group within HM parted its ways from the group. This time it was the al Badr group, which along with other small groups had joined HM in its early period.
