border. Interestingly, he told the investigators that he was not tracked and apprehended by Pakistani agencies, but rather he deliberately approached a security checkpost to get arrested. He gave the reason that he was extremely unhappy with his Indian handlers who had promised to pay Rs 50,000 per death in the bomb blasts carried out by him, but paid only Rs 15,000 in total. When he demanded his payment according to the agreement, they set him up in a fabricated police case and grilled him. Later, they facilitated his release and again asked him to carry out his activities in Pakistan. But being resentful of his treatment by his handlers, he decided to offer his services to Pakistan for carrying out similar activities in Indian Punjab. He had crossed over into Pakistan at least six times, carried out reconnaissance, exploded bombs and returned successfully. He was sentenced to capital punishment by the Lahore High Court.[2]

A Pakistani agent of Indian intelligence agencies named Ishaq, a resident of a village on the border near Lahore, carried out bomb blasts at Lahore Airport (6 dead; 12 injured) and on a bus that exploded between Lahore and Pattoki (45 dead; 20 injured). He was apprehended on the complaint of his neighbours who were suspicious of his fast-changing lifestyle. He was a poor person, but in a few days, he bought a bus to drive between his village and Lahore. He started wearing expensive clothes and did little to hide his ill-gotten money. During interrogation, he revealed that one of the local small-time smugglers, who used to smuggle liquor from India and cardamom from Pakistan, approached him to accompany him to India. These small-time smugglers operated in collaboration with the Indian Border Force and Pakistan Rangers. The Indian intelligence agency wanted an educated person from a village who could operate in cities. Ishaq was a young graduate looking for some regular decent income. Indian handlers treated him very well. Later, they asked him to carry out bomb blasts, for which he was rewarded adequately.

Later, although the series of bomb blasts ended in 2004, India accelerated its support to the Baloch separatists to foment violence in Balochistan, a vital part of Pakistan. Although comprising 44 per cent of Pakistan's land territory, Balochistan has a low population density. It has abundant natural resources and hundreds of miles of sea coast, which make it a key geopolitical area. It had been plagued with separatist movements involving senseless brutalities like the murder of Nawab
