Basra was also reportedly sighted at various places in Pakistan in the past five years, and Pakistani newspapers had often received messages purportedly sent by him claiming responsibility for certain sectarian terrorist attacks. Although police sources in Sargodha, on 5 April 1999, reported that he was killed in an encounter, his mother's testimony and forensic tests have since disproved this.

According to analysts and media reports, the strength of numbers in LeJ was in thousands as of 2014. Its activists were mainly recruited from the madrasahs spread throughout Pakistan. LeJ never fell short of activists as it had deep roots in the madrasah culture in Pakistan.

The head of LeJ, Malik Ishaque, was arrested in 2015; however, he was granted interim bail twice from courts. The Supreme Court was criticised by the ruling Pakistan Peoples Party for granting him bail, as he was charged with killings in more than 100 cases across Pakistan, including some very high-profile cases.

LeJ head Malik Ishaque was arrested in July 2015 along with his two sons. Later, Malik Ishaque, his two sons Usman and Haq Nawaz and 11 others were attacked in an alleged exchange of fire with police personnel in Muzaffargarh. They were taken to Muzaffargarh by the Counter Terrorism Department (CTD) to aid in the recovery of arms and explosives. While returning after the recovery, the police personnel were attacked by 12–15 gunmen, who succeeded in freeing Ishaq, his sons and the other accused and escaped. However, CTD police intercepted and killed them in an ensuing encounter.

LeJ had two of its most significant training centres located in Muridke and Kabirwal, in the Khanewal districts of Punjab. It was alleged that the lashkar also had a training camp in Afghanistan previously operating under the patronage of Taliban in Afghanistan.

The existence of the camp after the US invasion has since not been known. However, the operations of the group in Afghanistan were reported and the protest came from the top leader of Afghanistan who alleged that LeJ had been involved in some rare sectarian terrorist acts inside Afghanistan.

In addition to Punjab, Sindh LeJ was reported to have been involved in sectarian killings within the Shiite Hazara community in Balochistan. The Federal government had clearly mentioned the involvement of the group in hundreds of such killings. Furthermore, the brutal killings of Shiites on the silk route were also blamed on LeJ terrorists. These brutal
