Minister Modi, his Japanese counterpart Shinzo Abe and US President Donald Trump – which was also organised in relation to the G20 summit.[31]

High-level exchanges are important to drive bilateral relations forward. Moreover, they can play a particularly important role in times of tension, as during and following the Doklam incident in 2017. Intensified diplomatic work helped reduce tensions and eventually led to Xi and Modi's "informal meeting" in the Chinese city of Wuhan in April 2018. The Wuhan meeting became known as a "reset" in the India–China relationship and cleared the air ahead of India's formal entry into the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation a couple of months later.[32] In late December 2017, Prime Minister Modi met China's top foreign policy official, Yang Jiechi (Member of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China [CPC] and State Councillor),[33] who was in New Delhi for the 20th Special Representatives' Meeting on the China–India Boundary Questions. India's Foreign Secretary Vijay Gokhale visited Beijing in early 2018, and in March 2018, the two countries' commerce ministers met in India. Three important exchanges occurred in April 2018: India's National Security Advisor Ajit Doval visited China, the 5th India–China Strategic and Economic Dialogue met,[34] and India's External Affairs Minister Sushma Swaraj held talks with Chinese counterpart Wang Yi in Beijing. This series of contacts set the stage for Modi's two-day visit to Wuhan at the end of April 2018. The Wuhan meeting received positive press coverage nationally and internationally as an ice-breaking effort following the Doklam dispute; news reports emphasised the lasting and extensive bilateral relations over the allegedly limited temporary disagreements between the countries and the possibilities for further co-operation.[35] A second informal summit between Modi and Xi took place in Chennai, India, in October 2019, where the two
