several new deep-water berths, multipurpose cargo terminals, and modern dockside facilities, including container-handling equipment. There was also to be an industrial zone intended to host factories producing petrochemicals, fertiliser, steel, aluminium, and industrial chemicals, drawing on resources drawn from mineral-rich Afghanistan. A rail line was to be built connecting Chabahar and Zahedan, with India pledging US$440 million of an estimated total cost of $1.6 billion. At Zahedan, the railway would connect with a highway built by India's Border Roads Organisation circa 2009 and linking Zahedan with Delaram in central western Afghanistan.[20] At Delaram, the new corridor linked with Afghanistan's "garland road," joining Herat in the west with Kandahar, Kabul, and Mazar-e-Sharif in the northeast. These alignments are shown in Figure 6.1. During Modi's visit, India, Iran, and Afghanistan also signed a trilateral Transport and Transit Agreement facilitating movement of Indian goods to Afghanistan via the Chabahar–Delaram route. Pakistan had long denied India transit rights across Pakistan to Afghanistan. Now India and Iran were joining to circumvent Pakistan's roadblock. Iran and India thereby stepped up their cooperation guarding against a return of Taliban or other extremist rule in post-American Afghanistan. The Indian diplomacy associated with Modi's visit to Tehran was a shrewd underlining for Iran of the common interests of India and Iran and of India's willingness to work practically with Iran to advance those interests. The main theme of Modi's keynote speech in Tehran was "India and Iran, Two Great Civilizations: Retrospect and Prospects."[21] Modi played the same pleasing "civilizational" music in Tehran that Xi had played during his visit.
