many ambitious plans for India's economic transformation hinge upon greater cooperation with the United States. As he wrote in an op-ed in The Wall Street Journal, both "the US and India have fundamental stakes in each other's success," and more so for New Delhi, which seeks to rapidly transform into a developed economy.[38] In this, Modi is no different from his predecessors; all Indian decision-makers since 1991 have shown an understanding of how critically important the United States is for India. The difference, however, lies in the fact that Modi has been able to openly acknowledge India's bandwagoning behaviour and has no qualms about it. It has been observed that, by pursuing the "most unhesitating embrace of the US" in India's foreign policy behaviour, Modi has tossed away not only hesitations but also the hypocrisies of history.[39] Open ideological commitment by the Modi government to the Indo–US relationship is one of the most dramatic changes in the bilateral relationship. The signing of the LEMOA is not only significant because of its military consequences but precisely because it indicates a major policy shift: from the ambiguity of yesteryears to the commitment of the present government toward fructifying the long-held promise of a strategic partnership with the United States.

This conviction, when coupled with an unprecedented parliamentary authority in India's recent history, provides a firm bedrock for Modi's foreign policy. Since 1989, no Indian Prime Minister except Modi has enjoyed an absolute majority in the Lower House. Even though foreign policy has always largely been a domain of the Prime Minister, power equations in Parliament have had an influence on the conduct of foreign policy. A weak Prime Minister with low numbers in parliament is subject to the pulls and pressures exerted by party colleagues and political allies and also by the parliamentary opposition. Individual conviction therefore is often tempered by the lack of parliamentary authority,
