the 543-member Lok Sabha.[66] Enjoying majority in Parliament potentially opens greater leeway in foreign policymaking.

The main task of this volume is to assess change and continuity in India's policy towards China within the spectrum of alignments, between balancing and bandwagoning, and less so analysing what is driving India's policy on China. Still, whether China's growing power is the sole driver of Modi's "neighbour-hood first" policy, of India reaching out to Japan, or the improved relationship with the United States informs us about important nuances in New Delhi's thinking and policies on China. For instance, if India's pro-active foreign policy and response to China's rise is the result of leadership only, it increases the likelihood of substantial changes with another leadership. Moreover, it is important to understand if Indian domestic politics and state capacity enable or limit India's ability to manage China's rise. Henceforth, in this volume, the contributors look at the following three research questions:

- Has India's policy on China in recent years moved towards more cooperation or more rivalry, and is India's China policy today mainly characterised by confrontation or cooperation, or is there a more equal mix of these two approaches?
- Is India's policy on China mainly driven by the changing distribution of power at the structural level in the international system, or are domestic politics and bureaucratic structures in India, and the leadership of Prime Minister Modi since assuming office in 2014, also significant drivers of Indian policy on China?
- What are the main challenges, risks, and constraints India faces implementing its policies managing the rise of China?
