Again, I don’t know why exactly, I just don’t mention it to anyone. I just say I am flying home because Daniella is feeling unwell. It all stays inside.

When I finally get back to see Daniella, I meet her in the hospital. The process has taken a long time and when I arrive, she has been given lots of drugs and is very hazy. The drugs have kicked her into a paranoia and she thinks the nurses are whispering about her. There is a confusion when one of the nurses asks me for an autograph. I feel incredibly uncomfortable being asked at such an emotional time. I am too thrown, too out of sorts, to make clear that it is not OK. It turns out there are downsides to being Jimmy, scenarios that James would rather handle himself.

We stay at home for the next week, cancelling all Maldives plans, and spend some time together to try and recover. There is no cricket for a moment, no outside world, no future plans, just us both looking inwards, trying to help each other heal. Daniella’s hormones are sending her into different states and I try and move with them as sympathetically and as fluidly as I can. She stays in bed for a whole week. I do the running around – cooking, running baths, cleaning the house. It doesn’t occur to me that part of this is a healing of my own hurt too – that I am also wounded by what has happened between us and this time is almost like a physical exorcism, a kind of ritual to rebalance things.

It’s a strange thing to quantify when it hasn’t happened to your own body. Daniella tells me that it would have been a boy. She blames herself – that she didn’t deserve a boy, she says. She talks about how maybe she was hoping for a boy to fill a sort of void in her life after losing Nick, something that would realistically never be filled. She talks about how she had given her brother money to go out with on the night the accident happened, and that if she hadn’t, he wouldn’t have been hurt. There are all kinds of guilt she has been carrying. There is guilt about being the surviving sibling. A guilt that takes her to a feeling that the miscarriage is a punishment for something. We experience how one tragedy can open up the previous one, how they layer themselves into your being, one loss re-triggering every other loss from your past too. I try to listen and, where I can, just make clear to her that it is nothing she has done, that there is nothing she could have done then and nothing she can do now.

What’s worse, there are no tests and no answers to this miscarriage. Daniella takes herself into the hellish mental loops of whether she ate
