something wrong. Maybe she was on the wrong diet. Maybe she wasn't exercising properly. It would maybe have been easier to know that we had done something so we could blame ourselves and wrestle back some understanding of why this has happened. It would be better than sitting in the helplessness of this happening just because life sometimes chaotically deals you bad cards without any reason. My own need for control is brought into strong focus through it – the way bowling somehow soothes my anxiety, because everything starts with me and the ball in my hand, the outcome directly related to what I do. I can punish or reward myself each time, understand why it's happened, work out what to do next. I can bowl a slower ball to Sanath Jayasuriya, based on experience and rationale, because I felt like that would get him out, and it would work. It is all direct cause and effect. It is all control – a control that life outside would never provide.

A week later, we begin to tell people what has happened.
