buzzing at me, telling me I've failed. Something overrides my system, threatens me in a way that I am no longer prepared to accept.

When Collingwood skips down the pitch in the final, shaping Shane Watson through the on side and runs towards the team as we flood on to the pitch, I get that little thrill of having seen something brilliant happen, but matched with the ugly pinch of not feeling like I contributed to it in a meaningful way. I hate the feeling – of wanting the team to win but also the guilt of not being able to celebrate it as fully as everyone else. I have respect for Collingwood though, who made a difficult decision and, with the way it turns out, is proved absolutely right, even if he has had to watch me sulk for a couple of weeks. It was probably a small price to pay for winning England's first World Cup.
