favourites but the game is still very much in the balance. At 207-7, when I get Agar caught by Alastair Cook, it feels like the morning will be quite straightforward – even more so when Mitchell Starc gets out in the same way. After dropping a couple for the ninth wicket, Cook takes another off me to get rid of Peter Siddle with a really stunning catch.

We only need one wicket and we're feeling good. I'm in a good rhythm and we feel like getting the last wicket is only a matter of time. But Haddin and James Pattinson are just starting to slowly build a partnership. As they edge closer out of obscurity, we begin to have to hide boundaries from Haddin, balancing attack and defence, as we try to defend an ever-slimming total while still hunting for the final wicket. Steve Finn then drops James Pattinson at deep backward square.

As we are chasing the wicket, things start to go against me. There are some misfields – a few through people's hands, including one through Cooky's. I begin to lose the process that has kept me so controlled and focused with Mark Bawden. I stop remembering to breathe. I start cursing at the ground, making my displeasure at the fielder show. Cooky has a chat with Broady, who walks up to me just as I'm preparing to bowl my over and says, 'Jimmy,' – he's quite hesitant – 'have a little think about your body language here.' I stare back at him, red mist going through me as he bravely continues, 'Because you look angry and a bit stressed and are having a go at everyone a little.' I tell him where to go. I run in to bowl, not talking myself down. Broady is waiting for me at the mark. 'I'm only passing on a message,' he says, 'on behalf of the rest of the team that you are behaving like a nob.' My warrior mode is now off the scale, and I spit back at him, 'Did you not hear me? I've told you to fk off.'

Before I realise it has happened, I am running in to bowl my thirteenth over in a row. I have never bowled 13 overs successively. There hasn't even been a conversation with anyone that I can recall, it is just a given that I will keep bowling until we win this game. At the tea break, straight after my thirteenth over, I suddenly feel the pain. Australia, somehow, only require 19 more runs to win. I am cooked, my whole body begging me to stop running, to stop the process, to let someone else take the burden. I also feel the guilt. I take a breath and find Broad.

'You're right,' I tell him. 'Thank you. Red mist.' He nods back. I take the breaths. Five in and five out. Matt Prior stands up to give a team talk
