his mouth, eyes as wide as they will go. Michael Clarke: well taken by Alastair Cook. A five-wicket haul in 19 balls.

As all the wickets fall, I am caught up in the drama of it all, the sheer chaos that he has created in one morning's cricket. I am always in awe of his ability to bowl spells like this. It's as if he can create something on cue, just as and when the team need it. He creates theatre with either his reaction to the ball he has just bowled, a word with the batter or revving up the crowd. Then, it is as if his knees pump higher, where he turns a game on its head almost just by identifying the moment he wants to. It's an unusual, precious skill. Nobody can get the ball out of his hand at times like these. On this afternoon, Broad takes 8–15, Australia being bowled out for 60 before we regain the Ashes. I forget myself and my own sadness at not being there, jumping up with every wicket on the balcony, as one of the crowd. My only regret as Broady leaves the field is not that I'm injured, but that I haven't been able to watch him do it all from mid-off, as usual.
