Meanwhile, Tailenders all over the country score the game, sending us in their scorecards, some of them so detailed and precise, using colour pens and everything, that they look like artworks fitting of the day itself. It also occurs to us while watching that the day itself is a strange kind of metaphor for what we are doing in lockdown – a group of people, from the team to the crowd, willing something true, staying in the moment and making something happen through sheer love and will. The commentary too only flickering my conscience for the first time.

When the quiz comes around, I am logging in from the Tailenders account. Mattchin has clearly put in a lot of effort and as soon as he logs on, on my account, 3,000 people are on immediately, causing the app to be in trouble. Mattchin has been preparing all week. He has researched all the guests that are coming on – teammate and fast becoming a national hero Mark Wood, chef Ainsley Harriott, musician Nadine Shah, TV presenter Gregg Wallace, musician Ed O'Brien from Radiohead and broadcaster Isa Guha. Mattchin is over-psyched, put out by the amount of quizzes that are suddenly being done through lockdown, desperate to put his marker down. When people enter the quiz, there is a holding slide in Mattchin's front room. The holding slide alerts people to the fact that Jimmy's Instagram has not been hacked and that he's hosting a quiz with my permission. It's well thought through. What isn't that well thought through is the fact that the sign is the wrong way round, the camera reversing the image to mean everything is back to front to what he thinks it is. Selfie mode mirrors the text, it turns out. It looks like I've logged on to my Instagram live, 'Soul Limbo' playing in the background, with a text resembling Chinese on the sign.

I log into Mattchin's account and we have the first round of the quiz. It goes relatively smoothly, setting up the quiz and the premise. Then Greg joins Mattchin, inexplicably in a wide-brimmed hat, and gets through a round of questions. The problem is, Mattchin doesn't have an incredible grasp of Instagram and then tries to let his next guest in, Isa Guha. The phone isn't complying. Every time he tries to let her in, his camera is spun around to show his hallway. He starts making panicked sounds, telling himself everything is OK. His hallway appears again and again. Someone comments, 'I've seen Mattchin's light switch more than I've seen Jimmy Anderson.' The live comments are coming in. There's a lot of confusion and
