instructions from the listeners. He keeps trying different buttons. None of them work. ‘Right, I can’t,’ he says as he starts to get angry in his tuxedo, pulling his bow tie loose. ‘Look, too many people are trying to sign in.’

I am watching this play out, my head in my hands, a disaster unfolding on my Instagram page, everything going down in my name. Mattchin decides – after showing everyone his hall for the 27th time – that he’s going to log off and back on. He announces this to the tens of thousands of people who have tuned in. No one is logging off. The worse this goes, the more people join. When Mattchin comes back on, on my Instagram, my profile photo has gone and there is no sound. Now Mattchin looks very stressed and I am worried about getting a call about fraud soon. Mattchin is going beet red and now Ed O’Brien and Ainsley Harriott are messaging, trying to help him out. As he panics, he frantically presses anything he can on his phone, which then starts to generate the little filters from my daughters that I have saved on my phone. ‘What Premier League team am I?’ he asks, with a little cartoon bird now suddenly appearing. ‘How old do I look?’ The more he panics, the more stuff starts appearing on his head. By the time he logs off for a second time, my Instagram profile has been lost. They clearly think someone has stolen my phone and it’s been reported multiple times. I’ve lost a lot of followers and I cannot get in.

When we come back, a message has gone round, to join the quiz on Greg and Mattchin’s profiles. Everyone has stayed and found Mattchin’s account – they all want to see this car crash prolong. With Greg and Mattchin now on, Mattchin is trying to do a pre-prepared, Royal Variety Performance that brings Mark Wood in. Mark’s quiz is called ‘Mark Your Cards’. The idea is that Greg will say stop while he is dealing the pack and the card will have ‘Mark Wood’ written on it, which will in turn introduce to the quiz, Mark Wood. Mattchin has forgotten that the screen is reversing everything though, and when he tries to do this, he proudly and manically shows the card upside down. The word Mark Wood, it turns out, when reversed and then held upside down, seems to say ‘Mood Wank’.

Wood, who has given up on the quiz by now and left, messages me half an hour later asking why he’s getting thousands of messages that say ‘mood wank’. It’s hard to explain. The only thing I say is that, if it’s any consolation, the phrase is trending on Twitter, sitting at number two behind ‘coronavirusnews’. The only person who is disappointed is my dad, who
