to arms to seduce a Test batter into doing something they are telling themselves not to do, I bowl patiently at him. I can see that he wants to be very deliberate with what he plays at, what he leaves and to not unnecessarily go at anything. I love this type of battle. I know this one well. I bowl dead straight at him for a few overs, getting him into the habit of having to play every ball, each giving him no option but to block and be watchful. Then, when I sense he has been lured into the habit, I approach the wicket slightly wider, giving myself a wider angle, hanging the ball a fraction outside the off stump, marginally fuller and from a slightly different trajectory, so it appears to be a blessed final run-scoring delivery. His eyes light up. This is the run-scoring shot, he decides. He drives. Outside edge. Jamie Smith catches it. As he does, I reel back to the hundreds of identical wickets I've taken.

I've taken 123 wickets at Lord's, and there is a little of each of them in both those balls.
