yourself,' she says. 'It's so obvious that you are meant to be playing cricket. Soon, the world will see that too.'

We begin to talk about why I love cricket so much, about what it gives me and how it feels when it goes right. I do not, of course, have any conscious recollection but I begin to locate something planted innately within myself, the same urge to move and survive that had me in a plaster cast until my first birthday, but still finding the energy reserves to crawl. My thought process is turned as I heal, more into a hopefulness, an excitement about what it will be like to play cricket again, to see the ball do what it has been doing. I visualise turning batters into S-shapes again, the ball moving late, the sound of the stumps being hit or an outside edge, the feeling when it is you alone who knows what you have done – that it feels right and that in a split second, the crowd will erupt around you too. While I lie completely still in bed, I keep these things in mind and hope to be that person again.

When I daydream being that person again, I begin to realise what I am imagining. I am visualising me before my action was changed, before I started to overthink everything and listen to too many people. If I get the chance, I begin to tell myself, when I bowl, I'm going to bowl how it feels the most natural to me. It doesn't matter if it is not 95 mph. It doesn't matter if the scientists don't like the look of it. I will trust my body from now; I will listen to what it's telling me to do. You never know, this whole summer could have even been a blessing in disguise.
