In the style of the International Baccalaureate

Source A

Extract from: The Arab–Israeli Wars*, 1982, by C. Herzog.*

Syrian attacks along the northern frontier continued, as did infiltration into Israel from Syrian-based camps, via Jordan and Lebanon. In April 1967, their shelling of farming operations in the demilitarised zones along the Sea of Galilee [in northern Israel] were stepped up, with increasing fire being directed against Israeli border villages. On 7 April 1967, unusually heavy fire was directed by long-range guns against Israeli villages, and Israeli aircraft were sent into action against them.

Source B

Speaking in an interview in 1976, the Israeli leader, Moshe Dayan, explained how tension on the Israeli–Syrian border had escalated in the weeks leading up to outbreak of the Six-Day War.

I know how at least 80 per cent of the clashes there started. It went this way: we would send a tractor to plough some place where it wasn't possible to do anything, in the demilitarised area, and knew in advance that the Syrians would start to shoot. If they didn't shoot, we would tell the tractor to advance further, until in the end the Syrians would get annoyed and shoot. And then we would use artillery and later the air force also, and that's how it was.

Source C

Ahmed Said speaking on 'Voice of the Arabs' radio in Cairo. This radio station was used to broadcast Nasser's speeches (quoted in Six Days*, by J. Bowen, 2003)*.

We have nothing for Israel except war – comprehensive war … marching against its gangs, destroying and putting an end to the whole Zionist existence. Our aim is to destroy the myth which says that Israel is here to stay. Everyone of the 100 million Arabs has been living for the past 19 years on one hope – to live, to die on the day Israel is liquidated. There is no life, no peace or hope for the gangs of Zionism to remain in the occupied land.

Source D

A young Fatah member being trained in the use of his weapon.

