Netanyahu declared that he was getting involved in the judicial impasse because it was his duty as PM, because the country was in a national crisis. His intervention, he said, had nothing to do with any personal indictment. This led to a censure from the attorney general. He forgets to mention that he is responsible for triggering the national crisis. Nobody takes him seriously anymore.

What I was saying about the danger of messianism, following Scholem and Aviezer Ravitsky, represents one more dramatic twist in the history of a people who would have had to abandon a thousand years of beliefs to be capable of entering modern history. The only way the dilemma could possibly have been avoided would have been a constitution with a firm separation of Synagogue and State. But would that have contained the currents in the underworld? Not according to Scholem, and not according to what we see. Moreover, let us remember that, under one form or another, religious nationalism broadly coincides with the social division in Israeli society. Nowadays, the Ashkenazis are generally the more liberal and secular, but their religious-nationalist leaders have from the outset been the most extreme and the initiators of this deadly synthesis (the Rabbis Kook, father and son).

According to the news, the leaders of the Israeli economy met with Herzog and told him what they thought of today's main coalition figures: the insults I may be using here and there are nothing compared to what they have to say. The least is that "Levin is ready to burn down the country" or that Barkat is "a rag." They are unanimous about one thing: "In one month, they have managed to destroy the country." As for Netanyahu: "He is out of it."
