No idea how one gets out of this horrible situation. The only solution, in my opinion, is pulling out of the West Bank, as I already said several times. Of course, with international presence in the territories, demilitarization, etc. Two states, with economic links, possibly a federation. There is no doubt that the zealots, who consider mastery over the territories as a step in the divinely prescribed move toward messianic redemption, will fight a pull-out tooth and nail. The question is: how many people would support them? Today the majority of Israelis are apparently supporting the opposition, but will that stand when the rush toward the judicial overhaul resumes, once the holidays are over? And then what, after some cosmetic improvements? Moreover, while the majority may support changes to the judicial overhaul and may fight for the independence of the Supreme Court, no majority is guaranteed for a pull-out from the territories. Far from it.

This Friday evening, a terrorist car ramming in Tel Aviv: four people were wounded, the car overturned, and the driver is being held. The accumulation of over-the-border attacks and terror aggressions turn this into a particularly dire situation.

Actually, one person was killed and six wounded from the car ramming in Tel Aviv. The dead person is an Italian tourist, the wounded are British tourists. The killer is an Arab from Israel, from Kafr Kassem; he was shot. His family expresses disbelief. The Israeli-Arab parties condemn.

Notwithstanding the disagreements between the two countries, the US has reasserted its support for Israel in the midst of the present tensions. With an eye on Iran, the US sends a nuclear submarine to the Red Sea.

Three rockets from Syria to the Golan. No damage.

In Tel Aviv, 140,000 demonstrators notwithstanding the holidays. Impressive.
