Great tension in Jerusalem. Tomorrow, benediction of the Cohanim (the priests) and traditional access of Jews to the Temple Mount; hopefully without clashes, but police forces are reinforced to a maximum. Reinforcements in Tel Aviv as well. All in all, maximum readiness for possible further terror attempts.

In moments of maximum tension, Israel shows great resolve. Pity that such resolve takes place at such an awful internal conjuncture. This government should collapse as soon as possible. Not sure that it will. The steadfast demonstrators are our pride.

Sunday, April 9

In Jerusalem, last night and this morning elapsed quietly, although some thousand Jews were allowed to access the Temple Mount for prayers.

Netanyahu officially briefed Lapid, as head of the opposition, about the security situation. Upon leaving, Lapid declared that he came in worried and left even more worried. The government was dysfunctional, etc. In this case, it is indeed so. In such a serious situation, the defense minister is in limbo and a clown is in charge of internal security—a domain, according to Lapid, that should be left exclusively to the police. Of course, he is right.

I didn't yet speak of a relatively new group in our promised land: "La Familia." It started as a violent group of soccer fans of the Betar Jerusalem football team and is turning into a dangerous association of hooligans, ready to go after journalists, and particularly after demonstrators. They may become Ben-Gvir's militia. The police is supposed to intervene and make some arrests. They haven't yet.

According to a poll, the results of which will be published on this evening's news (Channel 13), if elections were held today, Netanyahu's coalition would fall from sixty-four mandates to forty-six, while the previous Bennett-Lapid coalition would get sixty-four mandates, even
