There was nothing much to write yesterday and there is nothing today, the last day of Pesach. How wonderful! But here the day has merely begun, and in Israel it is far from ended … Imagine closing this diary because all is quiet in the Holy Land: no police brutality, no military incursions into Palestinian strongholds, no terror attacks, and, especially, new elections on the horizon. In short, a dream.

But let's remember: everything should start again "after the holidays," that is, from Sunday on. In the meantime, the police are on high alert in Jerusalem, since tomorrow is the last Friday of Ramadan, potentially a very explosive day.

Friday, April 14

It seems that this last Friday of Ramadan will be peaceful, notwithstanding 130,000 Palestinian worshippers on Temple Mount. Only seventeen people were arrested for flying the Hamas flag; they will soon be released. This is quite an achievement for both sides.

If the weekend remains peaceful, Israelis will flock to the beaches and other nature spots. Don't forget that in its inhabited areas, the country is very densely populated, which, incidentally, is one more explanation for the move to the territories. Not only relatively cheap housing and great landscapes, but space. Never mind if that space belongs to others.

A few days ago, a very strange incident took place. In a Jerusalem yeshiva for girls called Horev, girls of the twelfth grade organized a Purim party, which they filmed. The film was soon all over the country and created a tempest. Its title: "If the Yeshiva Was Sephardi" or something like that. In a series of eight scenes, the girls juxtaposed their habitual, respectful Ashkenazi lives with imagined Sephardi behavior. The girls blackened their faces, introduced themselves with typical Sephardi names, hung portraits of Sephardi rabbis on the walls, and played their Sephardi
