roles, as obnoxious as those were in their imagination. The fact that eighteen-year-old girls can be silly is nothing new, but that religious Israeli girls can play racist roles is somewhat more surprising, and within a strictly religious school at that. Where did they get their notions? From their families? From their teachers? Is it official yeshiva ideology? Everybody was up in arms, and rightly so, but it shows that even today, in a strictly nationalist-religious school, there is explicit anti-Sephardi racism. And, what nobody seems to have mentioned: has this religious Zionist school no Sephardi students? And don't forget: these religious Zionist parties, Smotrich's and Ben-Gvir's, display open, quasi-official racism against Arabs. But, who cares, for them Arabs are just Arabs.

Fiery anti-Israel speeches in Iran and by the Hezbollah chief from somewhere in Beirut, on the traditional day of solidarity with Palestinians. In a first, the Shiite Iranian president Ebrahim Raisi directly addressed a Gaza meeting of Suni Hamas and Islamic Jihad, promising support in their struggle for the liberation of Palestine (Iran apparently spends some $100 million per year financing Hamas's acquisition of weapons). Simultaneously, the Iranians launched cyberattacks against Israeli post-office services, banks, the electricity company, and the water company Mekorot. These attacks have been neutralized.

Hezbollah chief Hassan Nasrallah, the Iranian stooge, made fun of the Israeli rocket attacks of a few days ago; according to him they hit a banana plantation, and also killed a few sheep … Yet Israel is not taking lightly the coordinated threats from all sides: it stays on the highest alert for the coming days, at least to the end of Ramadan. As I mentioned, the Palestinians themselves are remaining peaceful.

Although Netanyahu and Herzog tried to dissuade it, Moody's downgraded Israel's rating from "positive" to "stable."

At least one troublemaker has been sent packing: Yair Netanyahu, the PM's son, who was broadcasting tens of inflammatory tweets per day,
