That view did not impress all ghetto fighters. In Claude Lanzmann's film Shoah, Antek Zuckerman, one of the surviving leaders of the Warsaw ghetto fighters and a "Ghetto Fighters" kibbutz member, put it unabashedly: "If you could lick my heart, you would be poisoned." He referred to the Yishuv's attitude during the war and later.

I did not suffer from discrimination when I met with the "sabra" kids in the Shaul Tchernichovsky High School I was admitted to in Netanya, in 1949, but I know that other youngsters who arrived from postwar Europe did, in the various institutions they joined. The sabras (the children born in Eretz Israel) considered themselves as the elite, of course, and the newcomers were often called "soap" (sabonim), according to the story that the corpses of Jews were turned into soap. This did not happen systematically, but it happened. Actually, speaking of discrimination, many of the young newcomers from postwar Europe were its earliest targets, maybe even before the immigrants from Yemen and certainly before those from North Africa. Israel remains an intricate caste-like society.

Political activity will remain less intensive until May 1, when the Knesset reconvenes. The negotiations go on at the President's Residence. It seems that they concentrate on the appointment of the Supreme Court justices, mainly that of the chief justice (appointment by seniority or not, for example).

Lapid declared that if the coalition makes the least move to push ahead with the overhaul, his party will leave the negotiations forthwith. It's hard to believe that the Levins and Rotmans won't try to resume the overhaul. It is also hard to believe that the negotiations will lead anywhere. The question is whether Gantz, by now at the head of the biggest opposition party according to the polls, will be tempted to abandon the opposition and
