does not sound safe for the future of the coalition.

For the sixteenth week in a row, about 165,000 demonstrators against the judicial overhaul protested in Tel Aviv, half a million all over the country. A major confrontation will take place two days from now, on the Commemoration Day for fallen soldiers.

Yuval Diskin, the former head of the Shin Bet, spoke at the Tel Aviv demonstration. The present coalition, he said, was legally elected, but is morally unacceptable; it was put together by a man who is himself under indictment and who acts only to further his own interests: “Netanyahu,” Diskin exclaimed, “you are not the solution, you are the problem!” Strong words!

Justice Minister Levin insists on going on with the judicial overhaul: “That’s what we have been elected for.” According to senior government members, May Golan will not be appointed consul general in New York. That she was even a candidate is strange.

A growing deficit in the state budget, as a result of various promises to the religious parties. According to the law, the budget has to be voted by the end of May—otherwise the Knesset must disband and new elections have to take place. Will the coalition obey the law? Hard to believe or to hope for in the present context.

A few ministers understood the feelings of the bereaved families and won’t come to the cemeteries tomorrow, on Israel’s Memorial Day. But the clown Ben-Gvir doesn’t understand: he knows that he is not wanted in Be’er Sheva but he insists on going, because he must be in the news.
